

HAUTE
layered,

then stripped;

HAUTE

ISSUE 004

Layered, then Stripped

In this year's issue of Haute Magazine, we are crafting our work around the theme "Layered, then Stripped". This theme was created because Jennie (our lovely and incredibly hard-working creative director) and I wanted to explore the dual nature of the layer. A layer can add nuance and dimension, but it can also hide and distort reality. When a situation is lacking nuance and perspective, one must add a layer. Where there is truth to uncover, one must strip the layer away.

a note from the editor-in-chief
MARIA DE FEO

Every director has their own editorial, where they explore the theme from their own perspective. Each of these sections features the work of our talented photographers and writers. This year, we have decided to broaden our horizons, by including not only prose in our pages, but also poetry. The goal was to enable every creative on the team to express their vision through the medium most authentic to them.

I would like to thank the entire Haute Team. It has been incredibly formative and fulfilling to work with so many brilliant people. I really hope you are proud of yourselves: printed on the pages of this booklet is an example of what you are capable of creating. Never, ever stop putting yourselves out there: the world needs to see your art.

I am also extremely grateful to the Spoiled Life Team for helping us put this issue together. Everything about our collaboration, from our coffee-shop conversations to the beautiful clothing they have provided for the models, has filled me with joy and excitement.

Another special thank you to Transition St. Andrews for letting us once again collaborate with them on one of our editorials: all that they do for the environment in and around St Andrews is incredibly inspiring.

I hope you enjoy reading this booklet as much as we loved working on it!

Love,
Maria

the theme was Maria's first: 'layered'.

'Stripped' came from a lot of my own antagonism towards St Andrews. I had just turned down my offers to transfer, and I was feeling bitter about this place – a kind of stubbornness I kept running into (or imagining?). Was it really in the water? I wanted to get to the bottom of things.

To strip something is to render it vulnerable: unpolished, raw. Stripping is also provocative – it is free. Sexy? To strip is to be beautiful without trying. It is also, sometimes, funny. Silly. It felt like the right word for what I was trying to find.

Through this project, I have been lucky with the opportunity to translate each of the directors' visions of St Andrews into something visual – through getting to know them, through conversations, poetry, and glimpses into the circles they inhabit. That bitterness I had slowly unravelled... and was shared, then divided.

A note is not complete without the thank yous. To the directors – Maria, Rachel, Arielle, Elizabeth, Rina – thank you for sharing your version of St Andrews with me. It has been wonderful getting to know you. A very special mention to the photography team: Michael, Avery, Laurel, James, and Rina – I have learnt so much from you all and am so sad to see you go (not you Laurel).

Thank you also to Isaac Chirnside, Tessa Rava, Olive Qua, Amber Boardman, Spoiled, Signpost, Filmmaking Society, Film Society, Tempo, Transition St A, Northpoint Cafe, and all of the musicians, and friends who will show today.

There are really just so many people to thank. To the whole team – fashion, writers, events, models – thank you very much. Thank you for being so patient with me.

This magazine is always dynamic and ever-changing – and for that reason, very special. I hope you can see it too.

a note from the creative director
JENNIE PARK

Fig.1
a picture of salt and pepper and my cable and my hair tie on my bed

LAYERED

There is a particular choreography to belonging: the subtle mirroring of voices, the careful calibration of taste, the quiet editing of the self. When I arrived at university, I learned it quickly. Or at least, I thought I did. I began to dress not just in clothes, but in personas: more outgoing here, more popular there, more effortless, more curated. Each layer was a negotiation, a way of smoothing my edges into something more easily perceived by others.

The shoot I directed lives in that tension. Bodies are wrapped, unwrapped, half-concealed; fabrics cling, then fall away. Nothing is fully added nor fully removed. Instead, there is a constant in-between — a fraying. The garments become metaphors for the selves we construct: clothing tight to bare skin, stiff tailoring over something vulnerable and shifting beneath. I hovered at the edge of the frame, never fully centered, always slightly outside the circle.

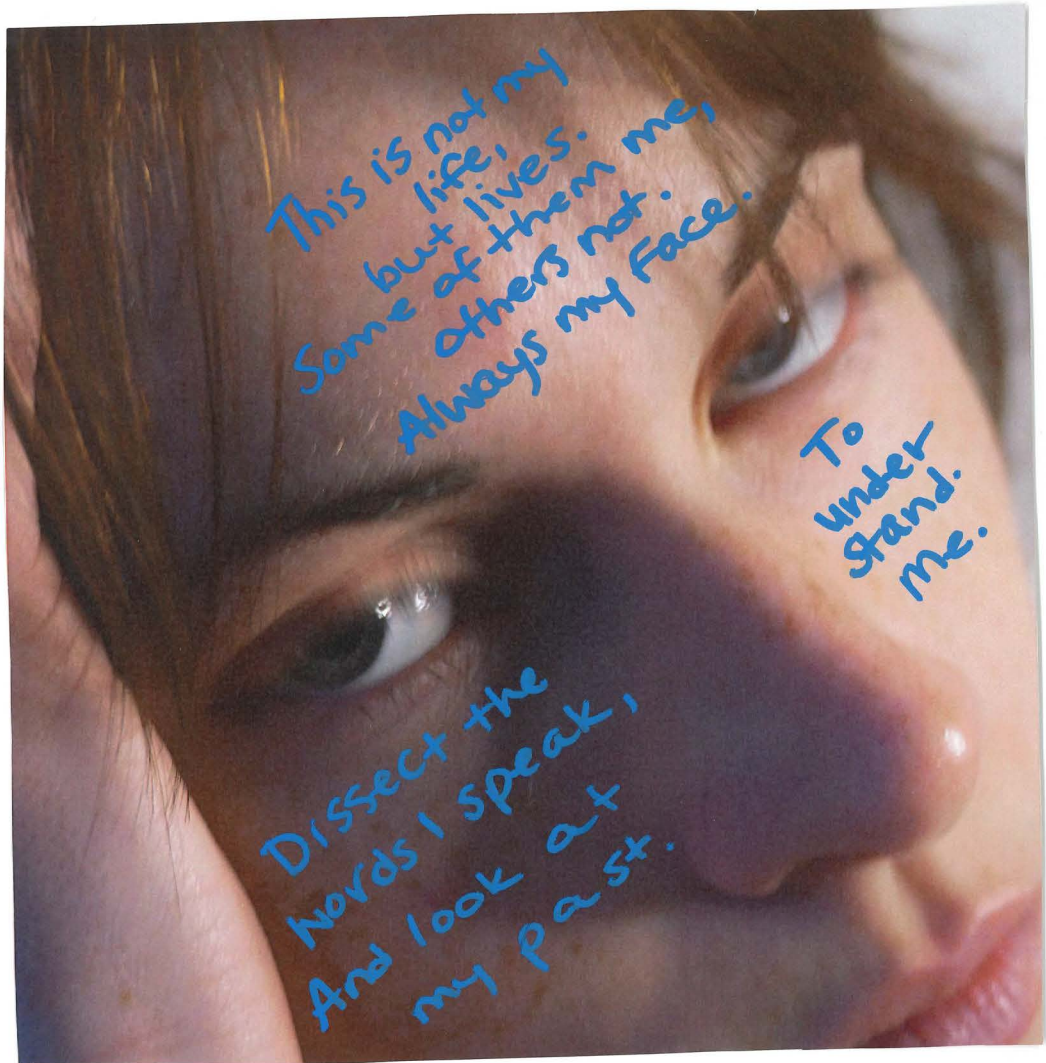

Because that's how it felt to be near belonging, but not quite within it. To watch connection happen just beyond reach, and to wonder what version of yourself might finally be enough.

But the more I layered up, the more I misplaced myself. The things I loved like my instincts, my clothing, and my quietness became obscured under performance. Stripping, then, is not about exposure, but about recovery. About asking what remains when the performance is peeled back.

words & direction —
RACHEL HAMBLBY

WHERE THE LAYERS FALL

I strip down to bare skin. A tremble lies in my hand; his gaze holds me, cements me to the floor and forces me to reconcile with what is mine. What is me. I've always worn an ego, figuring the grasping claws of others couldn't puncture through it. 'You're a star! You're a star!' they shout as their faces distort and melt into the facade around them, unnatural and inhumane. It's not a message that I want to hear, nor one that rings true. It's an insult thrown in my face, a reminder of the false ego I sport as a means of hiding the scars beneath. Like waves, ever ebbing and flowing, crashing ceaselessly onto the shore, I have gained and lost a consciousness of who I believe I am. I once wore scars as a sign of strength, proof that I have lived and will live again, that I have struggled and relinquished to the fates.

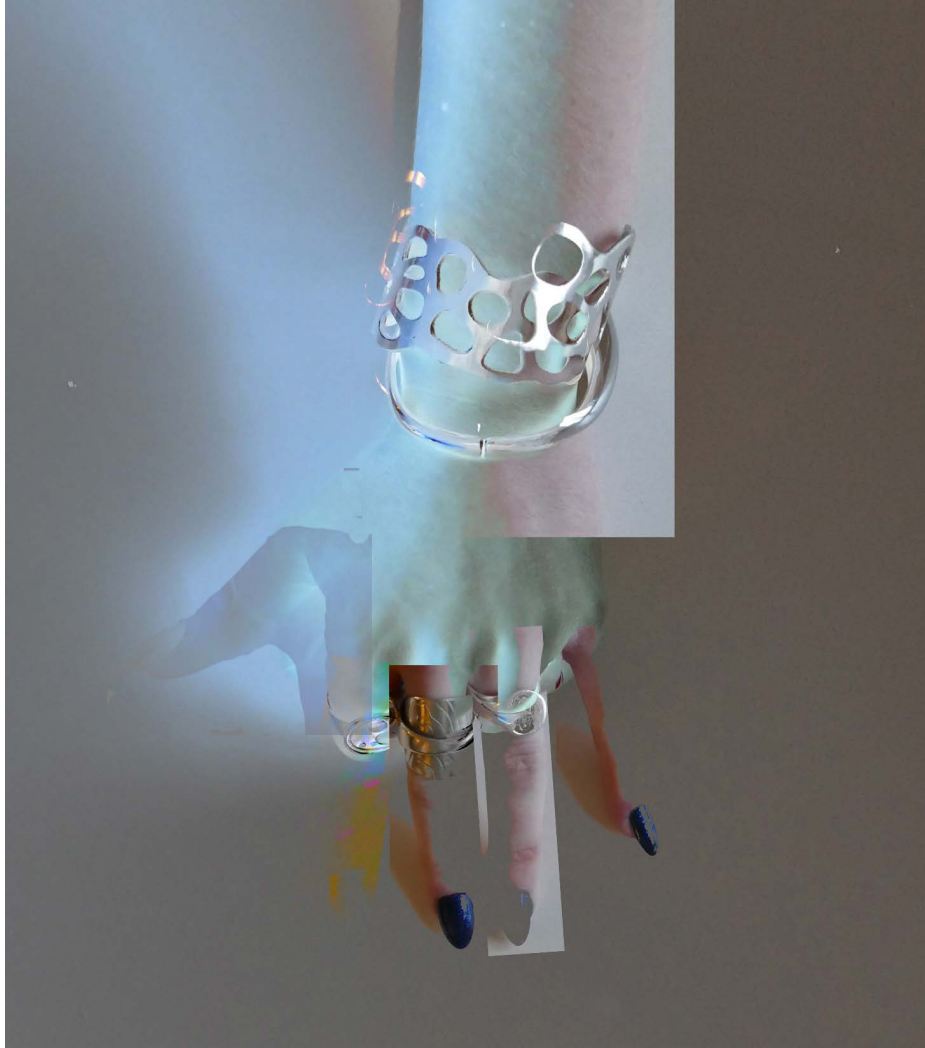

As I stand here in front of him, asking for acceptance, perhaps I am better off unguarded, willing to scab and scar under the hands of others. I have always easily scarred anyway. As an untethered die floating meaninglessly in a magic eight ball, he holds a reminder to my truth - the scorecards held up are blank, there is no eternal eye of judgement. With or without him, I am me purely – without the layers, without the defense. I wear it loudly now: an everpresiding protest against fallacy, although maybe an overshoot of the truth. I believe I've learned to shatter the mirror, to bring myself to the table with no extraneous sides, but has the overshoot snowballed into yet another defense? Am I a biased version of the truth?

He strips me down once more with the incessant passion of a greyhound whipping through the wind, incited by a need. I yearn to enter the circle of dance of which I watch, where passions fly free and embarrassment is fleeting. They act as themselves and enjoy it immensely, and I stand on the sidelines.

I pace back and forth, as though looping around and around the endless spirals of hell, a Virgil without reason. His hands guide me back. I stare at my bare self, resisting the nomadic noise of the eight ball, the calls from a state of doubt. It is I and me; I used to believe I was two stark sides of a coin, equidistant in nature but contrary in belief, a being of two. Past and present, though both a lie. Now, I stand here and be. Stripped down in his eyes, yet whole. You may not see me tomorrow - the defense often neglects lying siege, but believe that one day, I will be freed from the layers, finding comfort in the bareness of myself. I do not regret the forfeit to truth. Rather, I honor and grace it. I grapple with it and let it consume me. His hands have freed me, a Michelangelo molding my mind, releasing the strain on a pre-existing art of existence. For once, I praise him for baring me to the world, body and soul. I step into the dance circle, limbs moving free from restraint, layers drooping from my bones as ragged cloth, itching to finally fall free to the floor.

TRICIA MERONE

glass

(9)
(10)
(11)

Ph. James Issberner & ed. Jennie Park
Ph. Jennie Park
Ph. James Issberner

LAYERED

II

In this shoot, Rina and I explore the idea of the masking and covering layer. We incorporate theatrical elements, such as animal masks and exaggerated poses, in our depiction of domestic life.

By performing and hiding our inner lives to conform to the roles assigned to us, we end up trapping ourselves and others in a never-ending performance. The photoshoot focuses on conventions surrounding gender roles, particularly in the household. Through grotesque, eerie, and absurd elements, the shoot sheds light on how unsettling these masks can become, when they start to mold onto our faces.

Another aspect we wanted to highlight was ridicule. The lengths we go to in order to conform reaches a level of absurdity, obvious to every gaze except our own.

When I first saw the photos, I could not help but giggle at the seriousness of its subjects, juxtaposed with the absurdity of their performance. The mask traps us in a spectacle that is tragic and ridiculous all at once.

words & direction —
MARIA DE FEO

THROUGH THE RABBITS EYE

Through the rabbit's eye I fell,
and I found myself in the strangest place,
where caterpillars under white pillars take white pills with dilated pupils, mirrors always standing parallel.
"Drink me!" hiccupped teacups.
"Eat me!" whispered sweet treats.
I couldn't believe my eyes,
what if I mistook the truth for a lie?
Spiralling downward, until a piercing stare caught me there, in my despair.
It was a man in disguise, who held out his hands, two pills in his palms:
"Shall we play a game? You cannot lose – you'll only gain, and as a prize, you'll know your name and might discover we're the same.
Now choose wisely: one pill makes you mine to keep, one pill makes you gone."
And I did, I chose only one, but he shoved two down my tongue.
So, we played a game of chess – I played hard to get, while he went for my queen.
He always said: beauty is in the eye of the beholder, and that's when I became a placeholder.
He formed me into clay, dressed me in jade-green, wrote me in a play, put me on a screen.
And in between I helped, I held, I cooked, I cleaned.
He wanted me to be his ballerina – spun me like a spinning top.
In his grip, I twirled until the world blurred and stopped.
But under his view, I froze to become his new statue.
The eyes are the window to the soul, they say – and returning his gaze, I found a maze in the shape of his face.
He played me like a deck of cards; it was a rigged game from the start.
Toyed with me, enjoyed my company, his bluffing got me blushing.
He liked me best when I was gone, a faint projection to dwell upon.
Narcissus loved himself in my eye's light, I was the medium for his delight.
He engraved himself on my retina and then I knew my name was Helena.
A woman erased inside a man's gaze, fearing the moment to be replaced.
To be seen by him made me undone, to be one of many was to be none.
But I am no fool, I learned his trick.
I saw the hand that made the move and with a knife I split my eye,
I played along, played pretend, made-believe.
But unlike him I wore my heart upon my sleeve.
While he lost sight of me, I always kept an eye on him, when he lied next to me, I lied straight to his poker face.
But is it not all a game of cards?
Every time we played, it was an eye for an eye: stalemate.
I was his queen of hearts.
All or nothing – the stakes were always high.
So I became the rabbit's eye.

LENA SOPHIE ECKGOLD

also pictured, as bunny & figure-- lena sophie eckgold

III

STRIPPED

III

Stripped: It is not an uncommon theme in the St Andrews fashion scene. A large part of the student fashion shows involves striking bodies, lingerie, and defiant stares. However, this image is, to me, as much of a layer as Barbour jackets and Ralph Lauren polo jumpers, or some society merch. Stripping, when stoic, aroused, moody, or conventional reveals only more mystery. This section explores what we are when we truly strip ourselves of our layers. We are surrounded by a variety of 'authentic', 'open expressions.' These somehow make us more layered than ever- take online therapy culture as an example. For every new expression we learn, we design a self-checklist. So, in this shoot, we show what happens when we unbundle all our edges, and at the core, we are just plain ol' us. Rather than being stripped physically or emotionally bare, let's imagine being stripped back to being seen as lovable. The moles, pimples, veins, and smiles that, to our loved ones, are so very us. Playful, kind, and a little rose-tinted. Under all the layers that protect us and tell us who we are, are we fundamentally lovable, as many theists claim? I couldn't think of a better model to work with than Charlie Macbeth, one of my first friends at this university. Authentic, open, and a little theatrical. Through him we get to explore "stripped" as tender and unbound rather than a final defiant layer.

words & direction —
ARIELLE FRIELANDER

The dictionary definition of vulnerability is “the quality or state of being exposed to the possibility of being attacked or harmed, either physically or emotionally.” However, vulnerability is more than that. Renowned author Brené Brown says that “vulnerability sounds like truth and feels like courage. Truth and courage aren’t always comfortable, but they’re never weakness.” Vulnerability is being open, honest, and raw – being unafraid to show your true self and brave enough to admit when you don’t know what that looks like yet.

Vulnerability is walking up to someone on the first day of class and introducing yourself, admitting you’ve never actually read Pride and Prejudice, or trying a new sport in your third year. It is all-night conversations with your friends, trusting your flatmate with the family drama, or standing up at a public debate to declare your opinion to a group of IR students. Vulnerability is not only softness, but it is also bravery. It can be as big, or as little, as you like.

We wear our vulnerabilities on our skin, in our hair, or our sense of style. Choosing make-up or no make-up, hat or no hat. Vulnerability can be stripping everything back, revealing that scar from falling off a slide when you were 8, or the remnant acne spots from your teenage years. The beginnings of a line at the corner of your mouth reminding you of the times your siblings made you weep with laughter, or the fading freckles from your holiday in Greece worn proudly as badges of joy. We spend so much time trying to erase the marks that make us who we are, when it is these marks that others remember. Laying on a pillow next to your lover or laughing at a friend’s goofy expression, we seek out the characteristics of individuality rather than critiquing their flaws. Humans are tough, carved by experience and hewn by hardship. We are also soft and doughy, wrinkled and sentimental. We seek love with abandon and cry when it hurts.

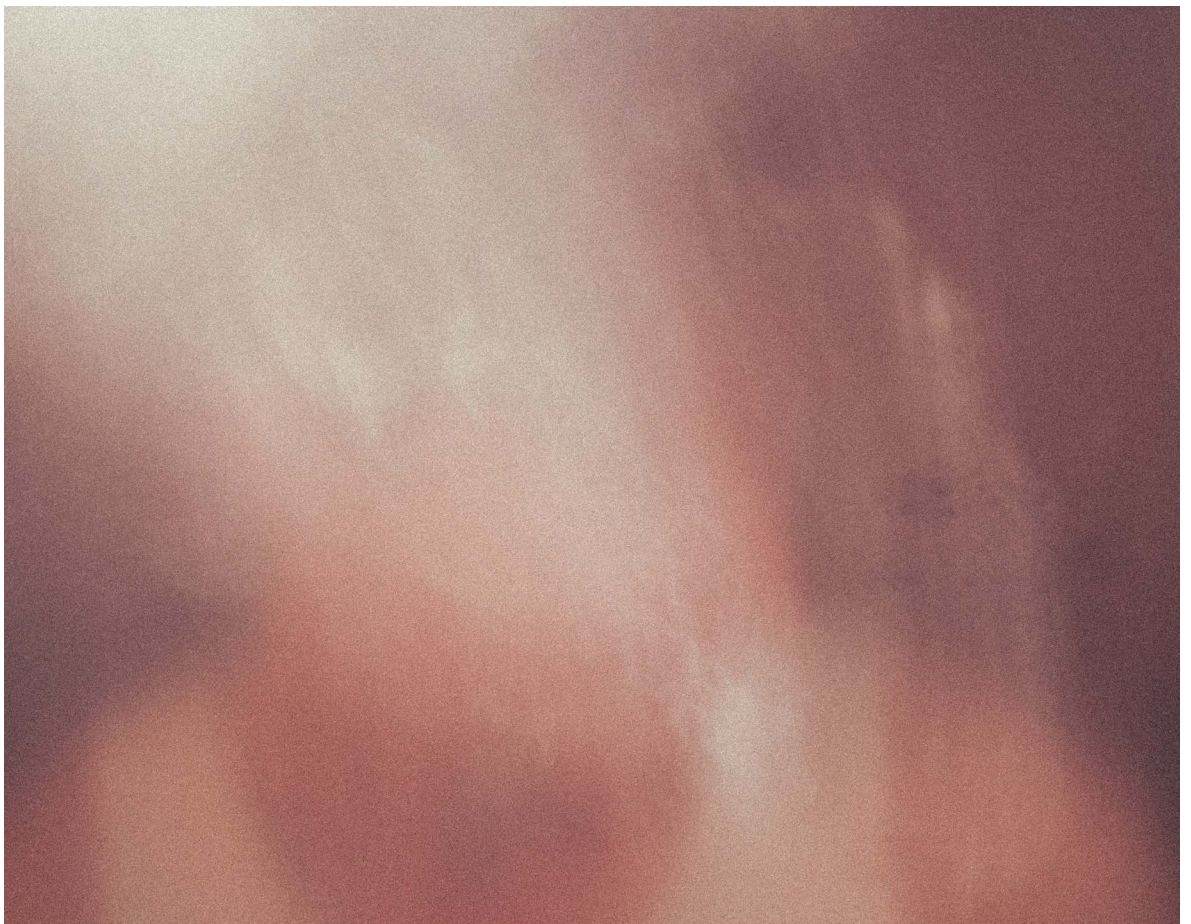

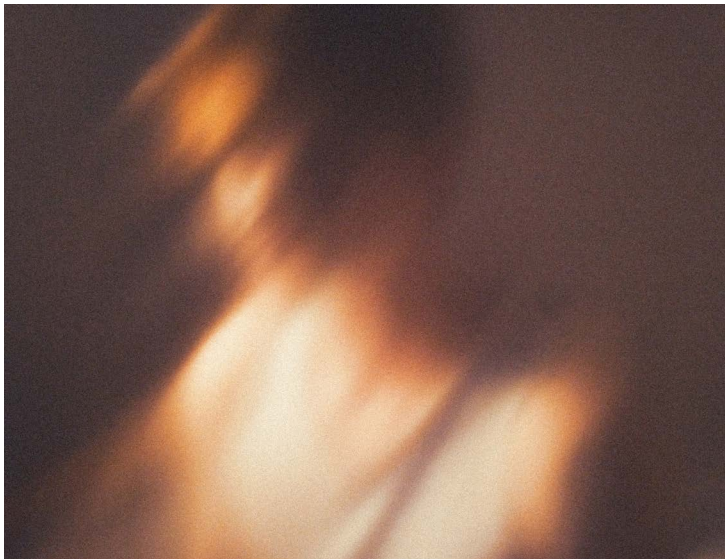

My sister has a photo stuck on her mirror. Not of her boyfriend or of our family dog, but of her as a child, when she was about 6 years old. People like to ask “what is one piece of advice you would give to your younger self” as if we don’t all have a child still inside of us aching to be let out. The openness and freshness of youth is constantly sought after and marketed by cosmetics companies, clothing stores, or therapists.

When making friends or choosing what to wear, a child-part peeps out from behind a rock to exclaim at the personalities and the colours, constantly prompting us to be curious and test the waters. What would happen if we let it take the reins? What would happen if we live for that child rather than try and fit into the mould that society prepares for us?

It is this innocence of children that defines the core of vulnerability: the daringness to do whatever they like, fearlessly introducing themselves to new people, and flagrantly speaking their minds. Our skin protects us from external factors, and at the same time exposes that which makes us physical individuals. Working together, these forces form the centre of our identity, enabling us to go into each new experience, interaction, or choice with an individuality that is imperfectly ours – being vulnerable as a means to liberation.

MATHILDA GATSBY

IV

STRIPPED

IV

Red is a very strange colour. Red means love. Red means passion. Blood. Red protects itself. The flag of most countries has red on it. No colour is as territorial. One would like to think that a place like St Andrews always will hold you softly, a passing place, a soft landing from the real world. But when you allow a place to become defined by a particular kind of people; when you enter a space shaped by a few, it can turn, quite quickly, into something else entirely. Everybody has heard that St Andrews is cliquy, "culty". But there is never any back room. No place somewhere down the hall where the real decisions are being made.

The only colour is....

words & direction —
JENNIE PARK

RED IS THE PATH WE CARVE

Red is the path we carve through this town.

Sweeping, oblivious, through the streets composed of unrooted cobblestones, discarded trash, littered with the remnants of a thousand passing students, my route scars vermillion into the landscape. I walk, alone, through tumbling towers towards the horde amassing by the ruins, noting each distinct sound that manages to escape the rabble.

Streaks of sienna burn across the sky, tracing the departed outline of day. Together, we continue onward. Candles gripped in hand, the flitting heat from their wicks our only physical tie to our materiality— and if someone's robe catches, their loose curls tempt the flame, will our simulated exaltation falter?

Tucked into caves, hidden in the foundations of otherwise ordinary buildings, we revel in our glory. Twirling and swaying and gliding across the dark, enclosed spaces in which we find comfort – the real world is immense and full of fear. Though it lies in wait, just beyond these few streets, it feels miles away.

Our fantastical land of traditions and routine, patterns of rhythmic beats drilling past our outer shells, merging into our very heartbeats. Our previously memorized behaviors and speeches collapse – leaving space open for unspoken revelation. In reverence of our present, we spin and revel while our skin gleams gold. All the potential and all our hopes funneled together in our favored confined spaces; we bounce and jump, over and over, feeling the music circulate through us.

Imprisoned under tons of stone, the weight above seems near unbearable. The air around us feels dense with the centuries of passing students who, to the stone, are indiscernible. Kinetic energy radiates from the rustling of deeply dyed fabrics; our dynamisms proving indomitable. We lean on each other and hide.

We dawdle under ancient archways as the sun returns to our horizon. Huddling together, we ask ourselves and each other and anyone else who dares to listen what we will do after this. We are happy here, dazzling in our youth – wrapped tightly in layers of silk and cashmere and chiffon and velvet.

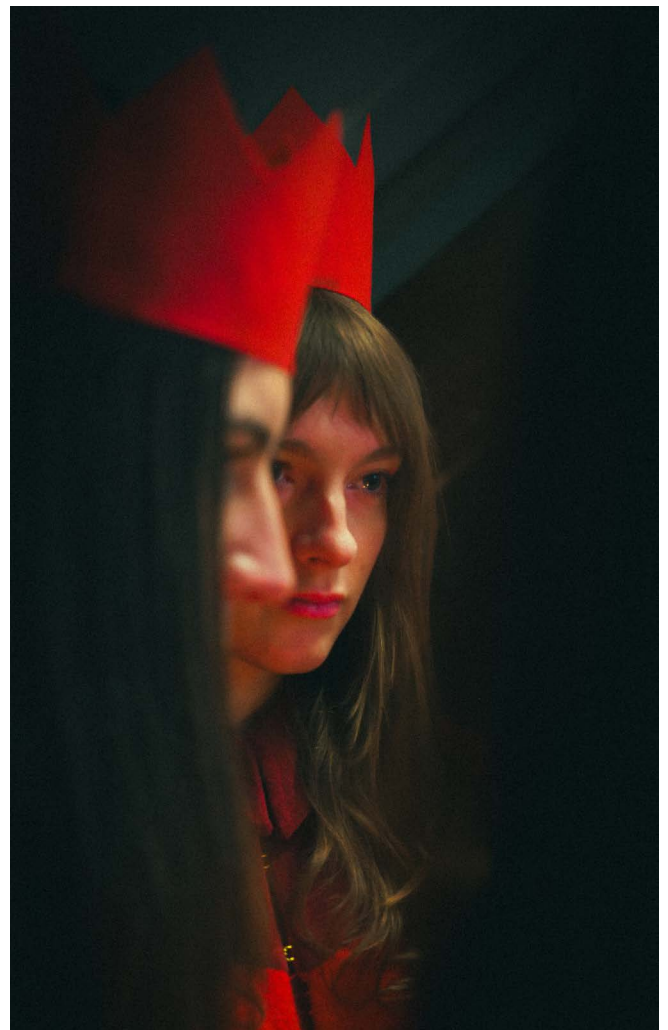

We mean to go home; we see the fingers of rosy dawn reaching across the sky and attempting to infiltrate our bubble. Around us the music plays on. No one else seems to be bothered by the encroaching light. The tightly wrapped bubble we have constructed around us begins to falter; shadows appear long and sharp, reaching their tendrils up behind us, clawing at their corporeal complement.

We come to, seated on packed sand with bitterly cold waves continuously crashing against us. Remnants of our fête are imprinted onto our naked skin, prickled by the cold air. Our ears ring with our own unique haunting melodies; pirouetting figures tempt us with each passing blink. Shocked to awareness, our minds sit void. Soaked red wool pulls us into the ground – it becomes unclear where the distinction lies between body and robe.

It is dreary, at first. With each passing wave, our memories return: of clinking glasses, twirling bodies, glorious fabrics draped over anything and everything. We recall the underside of our reality. So encouraged it makes us that with silent determination, the recently strewn mass arises and begins the beaten track leading back to our quiet streets.

FRANCES DAVIS

Set along a row of charming townhouses in the center of the tiny coastal town, St Andrews' trendiest cafe is constantly bustling with university students and tourists alike. Frequented by the huddle of the Bubble Run Club on early Friday mornings and closed out by committee members planning their next creative projects after contact hours, Spoiled Life serves as a backdrop to all kinds of customers – from athletes to artists to entrepreneurs.

University students don't ordinarily enter a coffee shop expecting to leave with a new set of earrings, a scarf and a niche scent. But Spoiled Life is more than just a cafe. The multi-faceted business also boasts a boutique section, featuring decor, jewellery and clothing from both new and established brands. Safe to say: the frazzled first-year desperately seeking a coffee to help them through Revision Week hasn't a clue the kind of experience they're in for when they first step foot in the store.

Glenn Malloy and Steve Davies dreamt up this scheme while travelling around Europe. The enterprise began as both a cafe and lifestyle store, a perfect hub for the crowd that herded through the streets of the old town. "St. Andrews is multi-cultural and bursting with tourism... students, locals, and tourists walk through the doors looking for something a bit different."

Inside, the space feels carefully curated rather than overtly designed. Neutral tones and soft lighting lend the cafe an understated elegance, while rails of clothing and shelves of accessories sit seamlessly alongside neatly arranged pastries. There is a blurring of boundaries here: between indulgence and routine, necessity and luxury. A flat white becomes part of the experience rather than the main event.

It is perhaps this fusion that makes Spoiled Life so distinctly aligned with the rhythms of St Andrews. In a town where students arrive from across the globe, often bringing with them a unique awareness of style, the café functions as both a meeting point and a stage. Outfits are assembled and subtly debuted here. Conversations about lectures dissolve into discussions of brands and upcoming events. Spoiled Life operates less like a café and more like a social hub for a fashion-conscious community.

Yet there is an ease to it all that prevents the space from tipping into exclusivity. Staff greet customers and take orders, with a steady hum of familiarity beneath the polished surface. Someone may come in for a quick espresso and leave unchanged; another might stay for an hour, emerging with a fresh outfit and a new sense of self. That duality of accessibility and aspiration is precisely what keeps the café in motion.

As St Andrews continues to evolve as both a historic town and a contemporary enclave, Spoiled Life stands as a reflection of its shifting identity. It is not only a place to drink coffee, but a place to be seen, to experiment, and, perhaps most importantly, to momentarily inhabit a lifestyle that feels just a little more curated than everyday life.

CLEMENTINE WILSON + RACHEL HAMBLBY

LAYERED, then stripped

V

Open the book of your life and turn to the first page. The virgin paper untouched and ready to bear the life you want. Coming to university is a chance for change, for exploration, for invention and reinvention. We have been subjected to countless films and books chronicling, romanticizing, and recollecting the university experience. For many, it is the happiest time in their lives; for others, the most fraught with existential anxiety and uncertainty. One thing is certain: university and the ages of 18-22 are when the majority of people develop into the characters they will inhabit for the rest of their lives. The crisis of identity in the 21st century is as large as the climate crisis and equally impactful, albeit in a different manner. Identity is not something which is found in generational lineage, but rather in self-exploration, identification, external realities, and social groups. As has been the case since the dawn of mankind, clothing is being used to communicate identity to the wider world, marking sexual availability, beliefs, age, and nationality. During their time at St Andrews, many will try on different metaphorical and actual hats. From the Anglophile flat cap to the Finance Bro baseball cap, all signal a degree of affectation. Entering the library, you will quickly note that there is a uniform which many don. This can place constraints on expectations of masculinity and femininity. Conformity leads to acceptance. While style at St Andrews is encouraged and remarkably developed, it begs the question: to what extent is St Andrews a corporate clone prep-school? To what extent have your affections become our realities? What's under your Barbour?

words & direction —
ELIZABETH ALEY

THREE SKINS

North

You learn the walk.

Slow.

Deliberate.

You have always known these stones; the cold feels familiar, not cruel.

You were born knowing the names of things

The right books, the right silences.

You speak in references.

Talk about dead men like old friends, drop names into conversation like anchors into the sea.

Something to hold you in the current of a room that hasn't decided about you yet.

Pull the red gown over the soft parts, let the ruins lend their erosion.

As if standing close enough to something so old may lend you some permanence.

You wear a version of yourself like a coat you found and altered to fit.

Some mornings it sits well.

Some mornings the seams show.

The cathedral stands at the end, roofless, open.

All that grandeur and still

The sky gets in.

Market

Tighter, more practiced.

You have been wearing this one longer

Since the first day

Since the plane landed, already rehearsing.

The most worn, the most mended.

You know how to laugh at exactly the right moment, how to be interested without being eager.

How to want things without letting anyone notice.

You mistake familiarity for belonging and carry on.

The careful management of ambition in a place too small to hide it.

There's something almost tender about it.

All of us dressed in our best indifference

Quietly desperate for the noise, the warmth of other bodies close by

The simple proof that we are not alone.

South

The layers thin.
Not gone, never gone
But softer here.
You still straighten when someone passes, still arrange your face into something fine.

There are fewer witnesses here.
You carry your groceries and your doubts in the same plastic bags.
You call home in doorways
Yeah, it's amazing.

You sit in your flat and listen to the wind test every window as if it's looking for a way in.
The version of ourselves we packed sits heavier than expected now
The coat still fits, but the confidence was always too light for this weather.

The bubble.
Like it's a joke.
Like you aren't pressing your palms against the inside feeling for its edges.
The dark comes early and the town folds in on itself.

The Sea

Peel it all back
And there she is.

She doesn't know your name
She's been here longer than the cathedral has been falling
She was here before anyone decided this cold edge was worth building a life on.

The haar rolls in regardless.
She just keeps dreaming, keeps moving, keeps arriving at the shore
Like she always has.
Something in you recognizes that.
Something in you has been doing the same thing all along.

Maybe she's the closest this place gets to kindness
Not the tradition
Not the title
Not the weight of the old stones
But she waits at the end of every street, asking nothing.
She sees you, stripped, uncertain, standing at the edge of something you haven't found the word for yet.

She reminds you that underneath the skin you showed up in Underneath the one you built here
That at the edge of it, the layers wash the same color
And there is still something she understands.
Something that was always there.

KATE HILDITCH

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF
MARIA DE FEO

CREATIVE DIRECTOR
JENNIE PARK

HEAD WRITER
RACHEL HAMBLY

HEAD PHOTOGRAPHER
RINA ANSHINA

HEAD OF FASHION
ELIZABETH ALEY

HEAD OF EVENTS
ARIELLE FRIEDLANDER

EDITOR
BAILEY ANDREA TOLENTINO

WRITERS:
CLEMENTINE WILSON
FRANCES DAVIS
HANNAH O'KEEFFE
KATE HILDITCH
LENA SOPHIE ECKGOLD
MATHILDA JAYNE GATSBY
TRICIA MERONE

PHOTOGRAPHY:
AVERY JONES
JAMES ISSBERNER
JENNIE PARK
LAUREL LAZZARESCHI
MICHAEL WU
RINA ANSHINA

EVENTS:
AMBER BOARDMAN
TOM GACHAGAN

STYLISTS:
FRANCES DAVIS
LUCIA CORREA-KENDALL
TALLULAH BATES
TRICIA MERONE

MODELS:
BAILEY ANDREA TOLENTINO
CASTILLE LE CHATELIER
CHARLIE MACBETH
CHEYENNE BOOTH
DAN VAUGHAN
GIGI BEESON
HANNAH BETTS
IHA JHA
INÈS VINCIGUERRA
LENA SOPHIE ECKGOLD
LUCIA CORREA-KENDALL
LUKE LAREDO
MAX MCSHANE
RUFUS POWELL
RUARAI GALLACHER
SOPHIE HALLORAN
STELLA BAGCHI
TAMARA KUKU
XINTING YANG

Editor-in-Chief
De Feo, Maria
Creative Director
Park, Jennie
Head of Events
Friedlander, Arielle
Head of Photography
Anshina, Rina
Head Writer
Hamblly, Rachel
Head of Fashion
Aley, Elizabeth

Model
Bagchi, Stella
Model
Yang, Xinting
Model
Kuku, Tamara
Model
Jha, Iha
Model
Betts, Hannah
Model
Vinciguerra, Ines
Model
Wilson, Gigi

Photographer
James Issberner
Photographer
Avery Jones
Photographer
Michael Wu
(Photographer Laurel Lazzareschi)

Model
Vaughan, Dan
Model
Le Chatelier, Castille
Model
Booth, Cheyenne
Model
Macbeth, Charlie
Model
Vaughan, Dan
Model
Holloran, Sophie
Model
McShane, Max

Writer
Hilditch, Kate
Editor & Model
Gatsby, Mathilda
Editor & Model
Tolentino, Bailey
Writer & Model
Eckgold, Lena Sophie
Writer
O'Keeffe, Hannah
Writer
Wilson, Clementine
Writer & Stylist
Merone, Tricia

Stylist & Writer
Davis, Frances
Stylist
Bates, Tallulah
Media & Events
Hohmann, Olivia
Media & Events
Gachagan, Tom
Creative Director's Assistant
Boardman, Amber

LAYERED, THEN STRIPPED 2026 HAUTE

ST ANDREWS FASHION MAGAZINE

EDITOR-IN-CHIEF
MARIA DE FEO

EDITED & DESIGNED BY
JENNIE PARK

HEAD COPY EDITOR
BAILEY ANDREA TOLENTINO

ALL PHOTOGRAPHS
JENNIE PARK
JAMES ISSBERNER
AVERY JONES
RINA ANSHINA

PRINTING
WINTER & SIMPSON

FRONT COVER: PH. JENNIE PARK; PICTURED. CHARLIE MACBETH

THE MAGAZINE WOULD LIKE TO THANK SPOILED LIFE FOR THEIR SUPPORT IN MAKING THIS MAGAZINE

WWW.HAUTEMAGAZINESTANDREWS.COM

